100 Years of Progress

—The Story of Public Health—

The Hughes-Griswold acts were a continuation of public health organization that began with founding of the state board of health in 1886 and a 1906 law that provided that each city, village and township send a delegate to the state board's annual meeting. This is where many city health departments got their start.

After a statewide smallpox epidemic in 1917 and the nationwide influenza epidemic in 1918, it became clear that a more comprehensive and formalized approach to public health was needed.

The Hughes-Griswold acts provided that approach and as written in the 1920 Ohio Public Health Journal of the Ohio State Board of Health, it "strengthens the hands of those charged with responsibility for people's health as nothing else could have done."

The legislation also spoke to specific "duties" for each district including basic services still performed today by local health departments. Those services include data collection, control and prevention of communicable disease, food safety, birth and death records, inspection and abatement of nuisances and as written in the original legislation, "all steps necessary to protect the public's health and to prevent disease."

This year marks the 100th anniversary of two legislative acts that shaped the future of public health in Ohio. The Hughes Act and Griswold Act, both enacted in 1919, established the modern day organization of local health departments and laid the foundation for public health efforts still in effect today.
